Green Games

- I The popularity of the social networking site Facebook continues to grow. As a result, people have begun to recognise the fact that it is a powerful tool that can be used to encourage people to make changes that could benefit the environment.
- II Recently, a new Facebook game called eMission was introduced onto the site. The game places players in a coastal environment where they have to build and maintain a virtual habitat, filled with animals. Players gain points and progress through the game by completing challenges.
- III Yet eMission is different from other existing computer games that deal with environmental issues. In eMission, players do not simply have to try and protect the world's resources and climate in a virtual world. In eMission, players must take action in the real world before they are able to advance to higher levels of the game.
- IV In fact, the biggest rewards in the game are given to players who complete environmentally-friendly actions in their everyday lives. In order to be successful in the game, players must switch to energy efficient bulbs, have shorter showers and plant real trees. These off-line actions must then be proved before the player can continue the game. Players can submit photographs as proof that they have indeed completed an environmentally-friendly action. Alternatively, a player's Facebook friends can confirm the player's claims.
- V While an increasing number of people around the world are becoming more environmentally aware, many of them believe that there is very little that they can really do to help reduce the damage to our environment. They feel that the issue of climate change can only be tackled through government intervention and that the problem is too complex for ordinary people to deal with alone. That is where eMission comes in. By encouraging people to take real action in the real world, the creators of the new game are striving to make environmental issues more personal. They are hoping to get individuals to think about climate change and to show them that they have the power to make a difference.
